Management & Organizational History

Management & Organizational History (M&OH) is a quarterly, peer-reviewed journal which aims to publish high quality, original, academic research concerning historical approaches to the study of management, organizations and organizing. The journal addresses issues from all areas of management, organization studies, and related fields. The unifying theme of M&OH is its historical orientation. The journal is both empirical and theoretical. It seeks to advance innovative historical methods. It facilitates interdisciplinary dialogue, especially between business and management history and organization theory. The ethos of M&OH is reflective, ethical, imaginative, critical, inter-disciplinary, and international, as well as historical in orientation.

M&OH encompasses a broad range of historical approaches to management and organizations, and is not limited to any historical period or geographical area, or to any form of organization. Issues of interest for management and organization studies may arise from ancient, medieval or modern history; and from diverse geographical and societal settings. In addition the journal is open to accessible historical research from related business disciplines such as marketing, operations management, finance and accounting, human resource management, strategy, technology management, information systems, and political economy.

The journal is not restricted to empirical, archival historical research using documentary records of businesses. M&OH specifically welcomes research on sources that are new and original for business and labour history, or for management and organization studies. The journal is also keen to extend innovative methodological approaches to historical research from organization studies. Theoretical, historiographical, and review essays are therefore invited from a range of perspectives in history, management and organization studies, or other disciplinary areas.

Topics covered include:

- The role of business, management and organizations in history.
- The treatment of history in management education.
- Reflections on historical methods and styles of writing.
- Implications of the philosophy of history and of historical theorists for management and organization studies.
- Imaginative 'What ifs' and narrative counterfactuals.
- Ethnographic accounts of the meaning of the past in the present.
- Organizational memory, nostalgia or amnesia.
- Corporate representations of history and heritage.
- The treatment of hidden or 'inconvenient' history that organizations might prefer to be able to forget.
- Alternative, critical approaches to organizational history.
- The ethics of past business behaviour.
- Counter-histories in/of organizations.
- Historical accounts of corporate cultures.
- The history of capitalism and other forms of political economy; the development of the capitalist corporation and other forms of organization.
- The history of management practices, thought and thinkers, especially their links to contemporary organization theory.
- Revisionist reconsiderations of established reputations and of contributors who have been overlooked.

Call For Papers

Management & Organizational History is now seeking articles for early issues of the journal. M&OH will, from time to time, publish special issues on themes of significant interest or importance and proposals for such special issues are invited.

Manuscript pages should be numbered and double spaced. This includes not only the text but also the notes, references, displayed quotations, tables and all other material. Please include a cover sheet with full author address, affiliation and other contact details, including email address wherever possible. Acknowledgements and biographical notes should also be typed double spaced on a separate sheet. Biographical notes (100–150 words) should give current affiliation, research interests and recent publications. Both sheets will be removed from manuscripts prior to review.

The title page should include:

- full title
- abstract (100–150 words)
- keywords (5–8): in alphabetical order for searching online, preferably not words already in title
- article word count.

Articles should normally be between 5,000 and 8,000 words, inclusive.

Manuscripts should be submitted in both hard copy and via email. Both versions should be identical. The electronic version should be in Microsoft Word (.doc) format (6.0/95 compatible) and should be sent as an email attachment to the address below. Title the file with the lead author's surname. Please include the words "M&OH Submission" in the subject line of the email. If you do not have access to email please include an electronic copy of the submission on a floppy or compact disk and enclose it with your hard copy submission and send to the address below:
