This is the concluding volume of a series on the reform of service delivery in developing countries. Each of the four previous volumes has examined a particular area of government activity: health care, urban water supply, business development, and services to support agricultural trade. A broad pattern of reform has affected these different sectors: liberalization, the introduction of private sector management approaches, charging for services and new forms of working with the private sector. The leading question running across the five volumes is whether these approaches are appropriate to the context and capacities of developing countries. This final volume draws together the strands, comparing the experience between these sectors in selected developing countries of Africa, South and Southeast Asia and Latin America. It argues that reform approaches need to be sensitive to the institutional conditions of particular countries.

The Role of Government in Adjusting Economies Series

In the developing countries of Africa, Asia and Latin America, public administration is increasingly expected to take on new roles of working in partnership with the private sector and with communities. Governments have to enable and regulate the private and not-for-profit sectors as well as directly provide services. Whereas the state may previously have often sought to displace and control market suppliers, it is now expected to support their development and regulate them positively. Although this requires less direct action by government agencies, it also implies a range of complex and, in some contexts, new administrative tasks. But development agencies, governments and researchers have given inadequate attention to considering how governments in developing countries might perform these roles. This series of books seeks to redress the balance and offers comparative studies in the governance and public management of service delivery.
