Senior Lecturer Photography Practice

Salary £32,031 to £37,078

With a portfolio extending from photography, advertising and graphic design to our founding disciplines in print media, the London College of Communication covers the whole field of communication, specialising in vocational courses up to postgraduate level.

The College is at the forefront of photography education and is renowned for a flexible and multi-genre approach to the medium grounded in a critical understanding of photographic and visual culture in a context of rapid technological change. Its alumni are prominent throughout the arts and media and many are actively engaged in redefining the boundaries of contemporary photographic practices and culture. The College also has a thriving research culture, which, as part of the University, achieved a five in the last RAE, and incorporates the Photography and the Archive Research Centre.

Working with the Programme Director for Photography, you will teach photography practice at both undergraduate and postgraduate levels, contribute to the seminar programme and to technical tuition across a range of photographic and digital media and undertake general course management responsibilities, including supervision of research students.

You will be a practising artist or photographer with at least a Masters level qualification, the ability to inspire students, an understanding of the conceptual frameworks underlying different areas of photography practice and an interest in the far-reaching implications of new technologies. Excellent teaching, communication and technical skills are essential.

In return the University offers generous leave, a final salary pension and a commitment to your continuing personal development and training in an environment that encourages excellence, creativity and diversity, and offers an exciting career move into Higher Education.
