Background

UK construction industry is the fifth largest in the world. It provides exports over £7bn. It contributes around 10 percent of GDP and employs over 2.1 million people. In the past decades, land regeneration projects that took place in many UK cities including East London for London 2012 Olympics have improved the working and living environment for many people, attracted foreign investment, created many jobs and make UK a better country.

Despite such a major contribution, some construction professionals are beginning to feel threatened by the recent slow down of the housing and development markets. They are also experiencing new difficulties in the planning and implementation of contaminated land projects.

CIRIA's Brownfield Risk Management Forum offers four lunch time seminars that will help you secure funding, managing technical and legal risks and, cut cost in land regeneration projects.

These seminars will also be available on the internet via Webex*.

Seminar 3

Environmental liability in Brownfield projects

29 September 2009, London

The seminar will help you understand the recent changes in UK environmental legislation including the Environmental Liability Regulations and how they could affect different aspects of a brownfield projects and the stakeholders.
