The political economy of work security and flexibility

Italy in comparative perspective

Fabio Berton, Matteo Richiardi and Stefano Sacchi

"Using unique Italian work history data, the book offers a compelling analysis of the impact of non-standard work on worker well-being in Italy and gives valuable comparisons to Germany, Japan and Spain."

Richard B. Freeman, Professor of Economics, Harvard University

"The aim of labor market deregulation is not just more hiring but an improvement in overall living standards. Via a detailed exploration of the Italian case, this fine book documents the importance of effective social protections to achievement of that goal."

Lane Kenworthy, Professor of Sociology and Political Science, University of Arizona

"This book is distinctive for its careful comparative investigation and measurement of the multiple dimensions of worker insecurity. An impressive study which is a must read for scholars and policy makers alike."

Martin Rhodes, Josef Korbel School of International Studies, University of Denver

The economic crisis has revealed the dark side of deregulation in the labour market: rising unemployment, limited access to social security and, due to low wages, no savings to count upon in bad times. This book casts light on the empirical relationship between labour market deregulation through non-standard contracts and the three main dimensions of worker security: employment, income and social security. Focusing on individual work histories, it looks at how labour market dynamics interact with the social protection system in bringing about inequality and insecurity.

In this context Italy is put forward as the epitome of flexibility through non-standard work and compared with three similar countries: Germany, Spain and Japan. Results show that when flexibility is carried out as a mere cost-reduction device and social security only relies on insurance principles, deregulation leads to insecurity. 'The political economy of work security and flexibility' is essential reading for academics, students, practitioners and policy makers interested in the outcomes of labour market developments in advanced economies over the past twenty years.
