Governance for the Human Future: The Centrality of Dialogue

The Journal of Dialogue Studies, in partnership with Global Humanity for Peace Institute at the University of Wales Trinity St David, invites papers that explore the ways international governance processes might be improved by drawing on insights from innovative dialogue theory and good dialogue practices.

Concept Note

Traditional forms of governance have fallen short of dealing with many important global issues, such as: the spread of radical ideologies; and the emergence of authoritarian regimes in democratic societies; and climate change and other environmental problems.

Over the last decades, there have been growing attempts at exploring and integrating alternatives for governance at both grassroots and national levels. The cooperative movement, Well-Being Economy, the New Public Governance, UN 2030 SDGs, youth-led climate actions, European Citizens Assembly, global environmental initiatives, and myriad forms of consortium and alliance are such examples. Inspirational governance models are featured by, for instance, practices of co-governance or collaborative governance, commons-based decision-making, participatory, direct and deliberative democracy, public value co-creation, and dialogic policymaking.

However, despite the promising practices, these models (with a few exceptions) tend to be engaged outside the governance structures and institutional processes. For this reason, we propose to analyse the absence of relational processes and good dialogue practices in governance as a major cause of the failure to achieve a global common good, even when the ends in question are obvious. Relational here refers to the dynamic character of listening, dialogue and collaboration, informing existing structures and institutions in a congenial setting [different from revisionist approaches]. In this sense, we recognise that any new perspectives and understandings gained from the progressive alternatives will not result in the abandonment of established structures and institutions. Instead, these processes and practices can help us imagine innovative ways that dialogue may facilitate the structural and institutional evolution towards more inclusive, participatory and relational paths of future-making.

For this Special Issue of JDS, we seek abstracts that derive insights from such approaches and discuss the centrality of dialogue in governance, e.g. the practices of listening, encountering, sharing, inquiring, appreciating, collaborating, co-creating and other forms of relating that can encourage and enrich the movement towards a more viable human future.

Call for Abstracts

Contributions are invited to consider the following questions:

How might dialogue theory and good dialogue practices contribute positively to the governance processes? In what ways might these insights be applied effectively to international governance?

Specific questions include:

1. How significant are various theories of dialogue for governance processes? How might these dialogue theories be further developed and enriched?
2. What dialogue practices might make positive contributions to good governance? How do they do so?
3. What are the major impediments to meaningful dialogues? How might they be overcome?
4. What might we learn from non-western approaches to good governance? How is dialogue practised in these approaches?
5. How might good dialogue practices transform international governance processes?

Contributors should reflect on these and similar questions and critically analyse any published work and field-based studies on these subjects.

The Workshop

Shortlisted abstracts will be developed into a full paper, which will be presented at an international workshop for peer-to-peer dialogue. The event will be extensively publicised with a special issue of the Journal of Dialogue Studies Vol: 11 (2023) and a possibility of an edited book which may follow in the next phase.

We expect this issue to attract high calibre papers that make a contribution to the field.
